A Storied Past

In 1794 when Lancaster Turnpike was built, it was one of the marvels of the century. Almost the sole avenue of transport between Philadelphia and the west, it was soon peopled with stagecoaches, wagons and drivers. To meet the needs of these travelers, public houses sprang up every few miles and among the earliest of these was the Ship Inn. The modern "Ship," which serves today's wayfarer with food and a "cup of cheer" is in the original building built by John Bowen in 1796. For this building he petitioned to the Chester County Court in that year for "license to keep a public house of entertainment."

To the experienced traveler of the 18th and 19th centuries, the Ship was known as a "tavern," the best of the three classes of public houses. The "Drover's Stand" was little more than a camp where the drovers herded their animals for an overnight rest. The "Wagon Stand" catered to the hearty drivers of the big Pitt teams broad wheeled wagons drawn by six horses-which were the freight trains of 1800. But the tavern attracted the stagecoach traveler and was the aristocrat of the turnpike. Both the Good Intent and Opposition stagecoach lines stopped at the "Ship" regularly for their four dapple-grays prancing into the side yard while the host hastened to greet the passengers.
